

ACTION REPORT

State of California - Department of Consumer Affairs

No. 40 - June 1990

President's Column

J. Alfred Rider, M.D., President

At times we hear criticism that California rates low among the 50 states in the percentage of doctors disciplined. However, it is not clear how these figures are obtained. For example, does an administrative review resulting in a warning or caution constitute discipline? A careful analysis of all actions seems to indicate that California actually is about in the middle percentagewise.

Of course these figures can be looked upon in two ways. By analogy, is it safer to live in a community with an extremely high arrest rate, or a community with a low arrest rate? Obviously, if both communities are doing their jobs properly, it would appear to be safer to live in the community with the low arrest rate. So should it be with physician discipline.

PRODUCING GOOD DOCTORS FROM THE BEGINNING

If medical schools do their jobs properly, select and teach competent, moral, ethical and honest students, they should turn into graduates of the same calibre. If the Licensing Division of the Medical Board of California does its job properly, there should be few incompetent, immoral, unethical or dishonest physicians licensed.

Finally, if the Division of Medical Quality monitors physicians properly, and disciplines early those who are incompetent, immoral, unethical or dishonest, few of these physicians will remain licensed.

It appears to me that one of the reasons that we are not a state with the highest percentage of disciplined doctors is that all three steps are being carried out well. Not perfectly, of course. There always is room for improvement. A system has never been created that is perfect, and there probably is no prospect for this - whether it be lawyers, physicians, politicians, judges, mayors, legislators, etc. However, we do constantly strive to minimize our imperfections. The Board has constantly supported and initiated legislation to improve its overall function.

The medical profession has very high visibility. Great emotions are generated by press reports of glaring incompetence or unethical or immoral behavior. These acts, of course, cannot be condoned. However, all too little publicity and visibility occur from the good things physicians do. Sure, we read about the spectacular heart transplants, liver transplants, re-sewing of limbs and fingers, new wonder drugs, etc. With reports such as these, it is no wonder the public expects perfection and frequently cannot understand a less than perfect result - a death from surgery or pneumonia, for example.

Physicians must continue to hold themselves to the highest standards of competence, ethics and morals. We owe it to ourselves; we owe it to our patients. Any bad act reflects, not only on the health provider, but adversely on the medical profession as a whole. It hurts the general image and the confidence which patients should rightly expect to have in physicians.

REDUCING DISCIPLINE, NOT INCREASING, IS GOAL

Our goal should be to decrease the percent of physicians in need of discipline - just as in society as a whole we try to decrease the number of people on drugs, etc. Every physician disciplined by the Board represents a failure and a tragedy in our system.

Each year we discipline a number of physicians which is equivalent to the graduates of several medical schools. An analysis of the recent disciplinary actions the Board has taken shows that the greater number were not for incompetence, but were for unethical, immoral or dishonest acts. Examinations can be given to help determine competence. But what can be done about immoral, unethical or dishonest conduct?

Believing that long term character patterns are determined by previous experience and behavioral patterns, one cannot help but wonder whether medical schools can do a better job of selecting applicants who are not only competent, but have other essential characteristics. The goal is graduates who will be the competent, moral, ethical and honest physicians we all expect. Furthermore, would it not be beneficial if the medical schools all over the world required courses in medical ethics?

In looking over the procedures relating to licensing physicians, it came as a surprise to me to find in the laws governing health profession licensure (the Business and Professions Code) Section 484, which states:

No person applying for licensure under this code shall be required to submit to any licensing board any attestation by other persons to his good moral character.

Thus, how can the Board screen applicants to try and decrease the number who enter our system with character defects which will eventually get them in trouble in California? It is my opinion that this is a glaring error, and one the Legislature should correct!
